oblivion - Arnie could cut it in a variety of roles. Content with this knowledge, Arnie signed up to make another comedy with the same director, Ivan Reitman. This time the movie was called Kindergarten Cop and involved the rather unbelievable plot of Arnie becoming a kindergarten teacher. The idea of the big guy working with kids wasn't, however, so far fetched seeing as how he'd just been appointed head of the National Sports Council of America by the President himself. His next celluloid move was to launch himself right back into a special effects bonanza with the wildly expensive and tentatively titled Rough Justice. Just like his ever-burgeoning acting success, Arnie's private life appears to be definitely on the up and up. He married the television presenter Maria Shriver a few years back, which also meant he married into the "royal family" of America, the Kennedy's, who Maria is related to. They've had one child and another is on the way, and fatherhood has turned him, along with Bruce Willis and Kevin Costner, into one of a new breed of Hollywood dads who never stop talking about their offspring. All in all, Arnie's life seems to be as smooth as his well-formed biceps, and just as impressive.

Arnie then took on the role of John Kimble, an undercover cop with an unusual assignment.

problem-filled science-fantasy production Total Recall with Robocop director Paul Verhoeven. Despite making a heck of a lot of money, the immense production costs meant that it wasn't as big a grosser as hoped. However, any doubts about his popularity slipping have been erased with his most recent release, Terminator II. It's a sure sign of his secure star status that he could afford to wait seven years before resurrecting his most popular movie character. Future movie plans for Arnold include less blood and gore and more cutesy pie comedy. One movie scheduled for the big man is Duke and Fluffy, the worrying tale of a man who turns into a dog (let's just hope Arnie doesn't turn into a chihuahua!). There's also a kind of Flying High-type spoof movie on the Schwarzenegger itinerary,

He promised he'd be back - no matter how rough it got!

In real life Arnie is a family man, and is married to TV presenter Maria Shriver.
